“...the Gallery has a major role to play in contributing to the cultural life of Western Australia and the region.”

- Kerry Stokes, AC.

Kerry Stokes

Inaugural Foundation Chair Kerry Stokes, AC.

I am proud to have been the first Chair of the Art Gallery of Western Australia Foundation. When we established the Foundation twenty years ago our aims were ambitious: to develop our State Art Collection to ensure it ranked amongst the best in the country and contributed in a powerful way to the cultural and artistic life of the State. I remain convinced that our efforts have been worthwhile. If it is needed, proof of this is to be found in Dr Stefano Carboni's intriguing insights into some of the significant works we provided the funds to acquire. I am proud of everything we have been able to contribute. I remain convinced of the significance of investing in Western Australia's cultural life and the role of the Foundation in leading this endeavour. Perth offers diverse experiences to all of its residents and visitors and the Gallery is a large part of this experience. It brings the creative world to Western Australians and all who visit us. It also showcases the best artistic work of this State and this country and by doing so, the Gallery has a major role to play in contributing to the cultural life of Western Australia and the region. It is a place, therefore, where cultural visions come together to create a unique outlook - global and local, personal and social - that will be a true foundation, the bedrock of creativity, reflection, and inspiration for generations to come. As I look at what has been achieved my feeling is one of pride and of the urgent need to continue in our work, to remain ambitious, committed, passionate, and to keep building.

Foundation Chair Marlene Stafford

The visual arts are a part of me. Working as an art teacher, and then running my own commercial gallery for many years, the arts are central to my being. My role as Chair of the Foundation has brought them even closer into my life. It's from this perspective that I can say that the Foundation represents a unique opportunity in this State to not just share my passion but to grow it. For me, the Foundation provides me with the opportunity to deepen my experience with art, to immerse myself in what I love and to acquire more knowledge and specialist insight. Anecdotally, this is what makes the Foundation so vital and attractive to many of our members. There are currently 326 members. These range from young professionals, to artists, to gallery owners, to academics, to business people and all in between. Through their generosity they have proven their commitment to the power and meaning of art. And through their involvement in a range of Foundation functions they have met fellow travellers and enjoyed exclusive behind-the-scenes insight into the art forms that makes our Gallery so uniquely fascinating. My message is simple - if you are a part of us, thank you, and if you are not, please join us. We can make a difference, and being involved with the arts will make a difference to your life in return. It has in mine.

building your State Art Collection

Stefano Carboni

While I am celebrating my first anniversary as Director of the Art Gallery, I am extremely pleased to be part of the festivities for the 20th year of the life of the Foundation. Since taking up my new position I have been increasingly impressed with the Foundation's past achievements and above all with its present goals. The Foundation's spirit of growth, ambition, generosity and community perfectly mirrors my hopes to build on, and to transform, the Gallery's rich legacy.

The Foundation was established in 1989 with the specific mission to help build the State Art Collection by providing funds to acquire great works of art. In order to achieve its goals, the Foundation has been involved in the cultivation of a community of generous philanthropists who have been shaping, and will continue to shape, Western Australia's artistic culture. There is indeed a profound and intimate link between the artworks added to the Collection and the people who contribute to their acquisitions, both making this place more inspiring and engaging for all Western Australians now and in the future.

I know from experience that this combination of financial / practical and intellectual / emotional support can greatly benefit the State Art Collection. My years in New York at the privately-funded Metropolitan Museum of Art have taught me that the immense power of private and corporate patronage can effectively make a public institution. This concept can and should be extended to government-funded institutions where creative partnerships with different private and corporate sectors can see great outcomes, which also brings heightened civic pride in contributing to develop essential cultural institutions such as art museums. Indeed, the growth and dynamism of a public institution in today's environment largely depends on the combined generosity of the public and the private sectors. This is why the Foundation is not only a welcome, but a necessary, endeavour - one that is central to the success of the Gallery. I look forward to seeing the Art Gallery of Western Australia Foundation build on its past achievements and take the lead in the creation of dynamic relationships between business, the private sphere and the government as we shape together what I hope will become one of the leading State Galleries in Australia.

A very important step to turn this into reality is the concept of the TomorrowFund. Based on the guiding principles of the Foundation, it was established in order to purchase the "best work of today for tomorrow". Thus, its aim is to provide a platform for business and individuals to join the government (on a matching $1.0 to $1.5 basis) in order to enable the Gallery to be ambitious and dynamic in its acquisition program not only for today but also for future generations. Basically, it is about acting now in order to create a legacy and a culture of inspiration for our children and grandchildren. The TomorrowFund has lived through the worst financial times of recent history, but the fact that it has achieved so much during this uncertain period is a sign of the faith in the value of the arts for all of us involved in this adventure. It signals that even in difficult times or perhaps especially in difficult times the support of the arts is ever more important. I am convinced that we have been able to achieve much in these times because of the strong record, the trust, and the solidity of the Foundation over the last twenty years. As such, we are here to celebrate already the fact that we have reached the half point mark of the TomorrowFund's capital campaign. But there is still a lot of work to do in order to complete the task in hand both in practical terms and especially in the effort to help create a "culture of giving" that notwithstanding past and present successes cannot yet be described as a strong trait of Western Australian philanthropy.

It is time now to look more closely at a handful of works in the Collection. All of them were acquired through the Foundation, which has allowed the Art Gallery to accumulate great works of art that I have just started to enjoy, admire and love.

Moonrise*, 1957, by Ian Fairweather

I first encountered this delicate, subtle painting holding its own against a strong line-up of paintings by one of Australia's greatest Indigenous artists, Rover Thomas. Fairweather was an artistic recluse, making lyrical, though entirely uncompromising, modernist works loosely inspired by Chinese art on Bribie Island off the coast of Queensland. Moonrise captures the very best of Fairweather's enigmatic practice. The work is exquisitely sure of itself as its flowing brush-marks open out the interplay of the man-made and the natural worlds. But it is also an essentially humble work: its brush-marks somehow capture the spirit of modesty of the artist who gives himself over to nature and becomes an observer, making art in response. The work was donated to the Gallery by media tycoon James Fairfax, who has been instrumental in shaping the media-scape of Australia in very different ways. This was his first donation to the Gallery and it has had a tremendous impact on our holdings of Fairweather's works and those of modernist Australian art in general. The work was very dear to Fairfax, for a long time residing in his study, and I appreciate Fairfax's great generosity in allowing it be shared with all Gallery visitors.

Arlatyite Dreaming*, 1995, by Emily Kam Kngwarreye

Fairweather's Moonrise also shares qualities with Emily Kam Kngwarreye's Arlatyite Dreaming, 1995, an equally expressive and powerful work of art. Kngwarreye's major painting is a donation by two munificent long-term patrons of the Foundation, Sue and Ian Bernadt. They have been instrumental in the success of the Foundation through twenty-five years of generous gifts of transformative works of art, of which this is one of the highlights. Kngwarreye, known simply as Emily by most art lovers, is one of the country's most important artists, celebrated for her incredible graphic sensibility and the immense natural facility as a painter. A senior member of the Anmatyerr community in Utopia, she started her artistic career late in life beginning to paint on canvas when she was in her 70s. She was in her 80s when she began making her iconic, gestural works often inspired by body designs from women's ceremonies. Arlatyite Dreaming is from this exultant mature period. Like Fairweather, Kngwarreye seems to perform the act of painting such that we read the work as an unfolding of gestures. We imagine the loop of the brush, the turn of the arm, the flick of the hand, the body hovering over the canvas, guiding it. The outcome of this activity is a striking linear tangle of dreaming itself, the lived experimental story. Her vision and approach to painting has changed the shape of what Australian art and Arlatyite Dreaming is, accordingly, a central work not just in the holdings of Australian Indigenous art but in the Collection as a whole.

Stump II*, 1976, by Fred Williams

Another decisive take on Australian modernism is given by Fred Williams's Stump II, 1976. This work emerges from one of the artist's less well-known but arguably most significant periods. Williams is best known for his minimal landscapes "calligraphed" through painted daubs upon ebullient backgrounds divided by a stretch of horizon line. Stump II, however, harks back to his early work made in London and shortly after returning to Australia in the 1950s as he "painted through" the legacy of Braque's cubist work. Stump II resembles this earlier work in his use of a muted palette and the close-up tree motif. Once again, Williams embeds himself as well as the viewer deep within the landscape, not outside it. The stump, the title feature of the work, is uprooted, rendered with an almost violent paint surface matching perfectly the implied uprooting of the tree. Liberated from the ground that once sustained it, it starts to take on a personality of its own, partly resembling a human face, partly a rocky outcrop as imagined, perhaps, by Max Ernst. This powerful work was purchased with Foundation funds to match works donated by the artist's widow, Lyn Williams, to ensure that the Gallery has the complete set of six Stump paintings. The painting perfectly expresses the conversation between materiality and representation that helps to define the meaning in contemporary visual arts. It was also significant to Williams himself, remaining in his personal collection until his death.

Colour rhythm*, c1928, by Kathleen O'Connor

The work of Kathleen O'Connor was vital in the development of modernism in Western Australia and has become essential to telling its story. Originally from New Zealand, her father was the famous C.Y. O'Connor who designed the Perth-Kalgoorlie pipeline, which supported the gold-rush population through the wheatbelt. She began her career in Perth but soon perceived that she could hardly extend her practice in Western Australia, so headed for the world capital of modern art, Paris, in 1906. Colour Rhythms is an optimistic, single-minded work, capturing all that is important about her practice. The colours pulse across the surface and the still life is activated as part of a less domestic, larger, more abstract and more historical vision. In a sense, this still life exists as the experimental ground of modernism itself, as it had been for Picasso and Braque as well as for Australian female artists such as Cossington-Smith and Preston. O'Connor's use of this genre was intended as a statement of belonging to the avant-garde of her time. Her work is also a statement of modern intent by a woman who took her art seriously and didn't let her distance from the presumed "centre" get in the way of her ambitions. In O'Connor's work then, the intimate interior space belies a much larger world. This significant painting was acquired with Foundation funds and has become instrumental in telling the nuanced story of Western Australian modern art.

Untitled*, 2003, by William Kentridge

The Gallery first became acquainted with the work of South African artist William Kentridge through the 1996 Sydney Biennale. Before arriving in Perth I was acquainted with the work of the artist through his New York retrospective as well as the Venice Biennale. His stellar international reputation as one of the world's most exciting contemporary artists has been forged over the past fifteen years in film, opera, drawing and sculpture. The importance of his work lies in how he unravels the legacies of colonial endeavours of the past three centuries. Specifically, Kentridge works address the violent turmoils of South Africa in the apartheid and post-apartheid environment. His artistic vision lends a new voice to the understanding of the specific politics of Western Australia, a culture equally built on its own problematic history of colonialism. He is now a key figure in the Collection, well represented by prints, sculptures and several major early film animations. His works convey a tremendous lyrical beauty like, for example, in the charcoal drawing Untitled, 2003, which depicts members of the Shadow Quartet (a group of amorphous dancers seen in silhouette against the South African landscape). These figures, like so many in Kentridge's oeuvre, are existential types whereby their mass—as in the Shadow Quartet bronzes—speak of the weight of history in an intensely psychological moment of a State which is self-redefining and redefining itself to the world. But they equally bear a lightness that resembles a dance towards freedom giving them new life and a renewed spirit. The drawing Untitled, 2003 is a perfect fit for the Collection and with the generous support of AngloGold Ashanti, corporate Foundation members who partially gifted the work to the Gallery, we are able to share it with current and future generations of Western Australians.

Daniel Radcliffe, 2008-2009, by Dale Frank* Monument #23: Slump, 2009,
*by Callum Morton

All the iconic works of art mentioned above constitute central and vital nodes of the Collection, exemplifying its richness and depth. Moving into the present, the TomorrowFund has begun to enable us to acquire new icons, works that will become part of art history as it evolves over time. Two recent such purchases are by important Australian artists Dale Frank and Callum Morton. Both are monumental, literally and in other ways, and both are major works in the artists' oeuvres and the result of much curatorial consideration and research.

When I first saw the painting Daniel Radcliffe by Frank a few months ago I was deeply impressed. Its blackness embraces you, reflecting and distorting yourself and the room around you, at the same time revealing the surrounding space. Indeed, the artist considers each new canvas to be a "black hole", of course not intended as the absence of matter but as a complicated presence of liquid varnish that flows and captivates the viewer with deceptively monochrome swirls (the result being anything but monochromatic!). As has been Frank's practice since 2002, the work is titled after a famous person, in this case, the actor Daniel Radcliffe of the Harry Potter books. It becomes, therefore, a strange sort of looming portrait whereby the absent subject and the viewer are locked together in a frozen amalgamation of black: it is an intellectual and emotional experience at once, which reminds you of the potency of the best contemporary art.

Callum Morton's Monument #23: Slump, 2009, is similarly physically affecting. At nearly 10 meters long, it is a fabricated wall structure with visible supports on the back. It is part of a number of works, including models of abandoned drive-in screens and wrecked buildings, whereby Morton explores the flipside of utopian modernism. As such, this work is as disturbing as much as it is fascinating and speaks of Morton's long term engagement with architectural styles and their historical significance. Now installed in the Gallery space, it actively frames its architecture as a platform for viewing, encouraging a reflection on the often difficult relationship between man and what he builds. The artist is perhaps reminding us of the failures of modernist architecture, slumped under its own weighty ambitions and ideals.

The magnitude of these two works, their scale and their literal presence exemplify what the Foundation is now able to provide through the TomorrowFund. The Foundation represents therefore many things. It is the people who make it up; it is the artworks on the walls, in the cases, and on the floors of the Gallery, which are the direct results of their actions; it is the reaction, the feelings and the ideas that these works instil into the minds of the people who observe and engage with them, many of whom may not even be born yet; and it is a platform for beginnings, always oriented toward the future.

Today, therefore, we celebrate the work we have done for tomorrow being fully aware that there is still much more to be done. I would like to thank and congratulate all Foundation members for their selfless generosity and their commitment to these ideas and ideals. Together with its dedicated staff, they indeed represent the Foundation, in a literal sense, of the Art Gallery.
